

As the public's demand for information about the pandemic remains high, criminals are seeking to take advantage, turning common information searches into information theft. We would like to make you aware of the latest cyber fraud activities.

- Outbreak maps. Malicious actors have begun spreading malware through online maps claiming to track the impact of coronavirus. As users visit the sites or click the links, they are exposing usernames, passwords, credit card numbers, browsing history, or other nonpublic personal information that is then exploited by the attackers or sold to other criminals on the dark web.
- Email campaigns. Criminals are also leveraging common forms of fraud like spam email campaigns, using infected attachments or downloads to gather information.
- Charitable giving. Scammers may pose as clients claiming to need funds for charitable contributions or expenses related to the virus. Be on guard for sudden or urgent requests for funds.

We would like to remind you to not click on unknown links and avoid visiting websites that could be potentially dangerous. We will continue our policy of verbally verifying all move money requests with you. Your wellbeing is our primary concern.

As a reminder, our staff is currently working remotely but we are doing our best to return phone calls and emails in a timely fashion.

Please let us know if you have concerns and we'll be happy to assist as best we can.
